DAILY SHORT STORY.

HER MASTER'S VOICE.

By CORA O. MORTON.

Pilly Hitten squared his bread simul-ders against the mantelniese and looked down at Gerta Reswell's blushing, down east face. She but in a low chair, her slender fingers playing with the base ther gown. There was the crown of a fringe of thick mabes and a soft curve reddened check

I am sorry, Blily," she said miserably when she could hear the choice me amile that was ghostly.

Gerta looked up with startled eyes, her lips were white as her cheeks, from which the color had fied. There was a trightened expression in her face.

Hinton reddened to bis cars. "Forgive-me, Gerta," he stammered "I'm a boundering fool-forget that I mentioned any one cise."

Hefore Gerla could reply there was a discreet knock at the door and a servani the strings and look of the foot and a servant entered with a florist's box. Gerta united the strings and look of at the fragrant, hing-stemmed roses, "Mr. Jeffrey Irving Jutileton," was engraved there and scrawled beneath were few penciled words: 'Be ready at 8 to accompany me to the Gouned concert."

Gerta sent the roses away and thoughtfully touched the bowl of fragrant violets on the table beside her—the violets had been Billy's offering. Moderate violets at shockingly extravagant prices-extravagant for poor Billy, who was clerk in a bank. Of course, Jeffrey Littleton could have showered her with roses, violets or orchids at any price. Jeffrey was rolling in money and he was one of the board of directors of Billy's bank "I am sorry, Billy," repeated Gerta

"Don't be sorry any more." laughed Billy aervously. "Be glad that I've got it off my mind—I've loved you all my
